

What I Missed the Most About New Orleans

By: Michael Sobrepera

18-Nov-2015

So you ask me what I missed the most while I was away from New Orleans, well I could say MY LIFE. However, then I would probably get in trouble, so here are a few more details. I'd say that the worst thing was being out of sync. When I say I was out of sync I mean not going to my school, not living where I'm used to, and basically not doing what I'm accustomed to doing. When I was in Destin, for example, I was staying in a tiny little house with my parents, sisters, and grand parents. While in Destin, I also couldn't go and ride my bike (well actually I didn't have it). Anyway the point is that the way of life was completely different. I also went to a school that I would call pretty much the plane opposite of Trinity, which threw off the way that my life is structured.

The thing that I missed second most was seeing common faces. It was not horrible because I did have a good few friends around. The friends that were in Destin were Campbell, Christian, Emily, Cheney, Ellie, and at the beginning Bren. However, I still missed the rest of my friends. The only form of communication was the internet and some people were cut off from that.

The things that I missed third most were my possessions. I know that people always say, "oh you can replace your possessions" but they're YOUR possessions, and a lot of them have memories tied to them making them irreplaceable. Although I didn't lose anything, it took me a while to find that out. Even once I did find out that my house didn't sustain extreme damage, not being around my possessions after a hurricane still feels kind of like they're gone and they're definitely not around so it's easy to miss them.

Life's still not back to normal but it's getting there. My life is beginning to get back into sync. I've begun seeing common faces so that has gotten better, but I still haven't seen a lot of people. Since I'm back in my house I no longer miss my possessions.